

LATEST ANTI-POISON BOTTLE

Warning of Danger Conveyed by This Device Made by Means of a Peculiar Odor.

American Medicine gives this account of a device to prevent accidental poisoning:

"A poison bottle, intended to give warning when opened that it contains poison, has been invented by a New York doctor as his contribution to the effort to reduce the number of deaths caused by accidental taking of poisons, such as bichloride of mercury tablets. His poison bottle liberates a very noticeable odor every time it is opened. In the neck of the bottle, on the inside below the cork line, is a little niche, in which rests a sack containing the smelling chemical.

"Another application of the idea is the placing of such a sack in a niche on the bottom of the cork. When the cork is taken out of the bottle the sack sends its odor into the air, which serves as a warning. Any druggist can concoct the necessary smell, making it either disagreeably nasty or simply just penetrating, and no one would be likely to swallow a supposed headache tablet coming from such a bottle.

"These efforts to reduce the menace of the 'poison bottle' deserve the hearty support of the profession, for accidental poisoning presents a serious and growing problem."
